My father, as you know, was some kind of gentleman farmer in the country. And I, in his explicit passion, inherited him in the same quiet, unwilling pursuit, because ambition pushed me to higher purposes, and I established myself that, ignoring his voice, I was burying my talent in the ground, hiding my light under the bushel. My mother did when she was drinking to convince me that I was capable of great achievement. My father, who thought that ambition was the safest way to destroy, and to change but another word for destruction, would not listen to a plot for the good of my condition, or of my mortgags. He assured me it was all, and was excited about me, with his last breath, I don't know what to tell you.
